Few disciplines and paradigm shifts have caught the imagination as much as Artificial Intelligence has over the last few years. The prospects of what AI can accomplish in every human endeavor are exciting and outright scary. From machines that can mimic human behavior to speak, sing, and write to software that can generate new protein structures to drugs that can be designed and tested with synthetic data - are no longer limited to fiction -they are a reality.

Healthcare in general and Vision in particular are no exception to these developments. Eye Care has been an early adapter of leveraging AI, thanks to the massive volumes of images our work generates. Automatic image reading and predicting anomalies seems like an easy candidate for the application of AI. The reality though is that much of the work is still confined to a small set of use cases - mostly improving the quality of images to identifying and leveraging some image reading capabilities in limited resource settings.

For most of us, practicing doctors and scientists, our days have become longer; more patients need our attention, and we still have found no silver bullet to make software take away our perennial Achilles heel - good quality data! How do we address this conundrum? How can we collectively address this problem? How can we tap into the power of digital health evolution in general and AI, in particular, to help improve outcomes and reduce physician burden?

We have 3 illustrious panelists to talk about this topic. Dr. Anurag Agrawal, Dr. Ramesh Hariharan and Venkat Peri.

Collectively, they will help us appreciate the fiction from reality, the practical relevance and application of AI, the importance of generating good quality and accurate data, and the fact that much of the work is hard grind notwithstanding the developments of AI.

This Anterior Segment OCT shows a post cataract surgery DM detachment with two hyper-reflective layers separated by a dark space in between (white arrows). This is similar to a type 2 DM detachment described by Dua et al (Am J Ophthalmol. 2020;218:84-98), where the DM is separated from Dua's layer. Additionally, there is disruption of posterior stromal layers (yellow arrows), likely due to stromal hydration.	Nency Majethiya
The inadvertent bleb: - This Anterior Segment OCT shows a cystic lesion with a cyst wall (white arrows) in this eye post manual small incision cataract surgery. Provisional clinical diagnosis was post surgical inclusion cyst, with ASOCT showing clear communication with anterior chamber through the SICS tunnel (white asterisk). Excision biopsy was performed, and histopathology revealed absence of lining epithelium, thereby ruling out an inclusion cyst. Final diagnosis was conjunctival myxoid stroma with intrastromal cyst. """"Suspended Hope: The Journey of a Graft in Search of Belonging""" A 38-year-old female presented with a hanging graft that was attached to the donor site by only 3-4 sutures. The underlying surface was completely epithelialized. She had undergone therapeutic keratoplasty one and a half months prior with a large graft. It is hypothesized that in the case of a large graft, epithelialization had occurred beneath the graft rather than over it. This observation highlights the importance of performing a peritomy in cases involving large grafts."	Iffat Nasir

The Salmon Scare - This 59 year old female patient complained of a mass growing in her left eye. On examination, she had follicles in both eyes, along with bulbar subconjunctival masses in right eye with a classical salmon patch in left eye, as seen here. Incisional biopsy was performed for both eyes, with histopathology and immunohistochemistry confirming the diagnosis of Benign reactive lymphoid hyperplasia, thereby ruling out a lymphoma.
